Luxury may be a state of mind, as consummately elegant stylist and designer L'Wren Scott once stated. But creating the environment for that state of mind to flourish takes a bit of know-how, too.

As architects of sophisticated new Scottish homes, and renovators of exceptional traditional properties, Thomas Robinson Architects know the attention to detail required to make a home truly refined. It may be in the choice of stone detailing around an entrance, or carefully considering how light falls in a new home, right down to perfecting the cornicing. It's these and hundreds of other details that create a sense of luxury.

Living luxuriously means doing things the right way. Another of L'Wren Scott's style diktats was that a woman should wear a nude shoe to give the illusion of a longer leg. However, if that shoe itself isn't well designed or is slightly the wrong hue, it's easy to imagine the effect falling flat. The same is true of graceful architecture. The company have studied what creates beauty and longevity in buildings of the past – Thomas Robinson is a specialist in traditional architecture – as well as the best technologies and sustainable materials of the present. They use this knowledge to create attractive and durable spaces for the future, and always avoid shortcuts or cheap imitations.

Another element of luxury living is ensuring a building blends into its environment. Take the large detached house pictured. This pleasing new home sits seamlessly in its setting, harking back to the Arts and Crafts architectural style. It reflects the best of this period, yet also suits an elegantly lived modern life. In practical terms, it's less work to maintain, and effortless to live in.
